We all like living in Germany - why else would we be here? And by and large the people are wonderful, but some things they do still make us hot under the collar. Germany is a complex country made of 16 different states with lots of regional differences, especially when it comes to culture and values. So, of course it's hard to generalize. TL;DR: German racism in 99% of cases is cultural racism. The average German does NOT care about your actual ethnicity, but about the values you hold, traditions you follow and culture you practice. Unnecessary Smiling Europeans, especially northern Europeans (not just Germans), only smile when they want to. Smiling at some stranger you have never met before is considered foolish.
